The spokesperson who checks first.

Dr. Rabiaah Bhatia answered our eight questions in the order we asked them, and on almost every one she came back to the same point. Say what you know. Say what you do not. Say it once the facts are clear.

That is an unfashionable position for someone with a microphone, and she has held a good many microphones: keynote and panel sessions at G20 initiatives, guest spots on 92.7 BIG FM, her own podcasts and executive interviews on eD WebStudio Channel, the venture she founded in 2017.

The route there was not straight. Eighteen years across industry domains and roles. Milestones, and then a need for more purpose than the milestones gave her. Two years off. In 2015 she walked into education with one aim, to help young people grow into leaders, and she has not really left.

Today she is a Professor of Practice at Amity University, sits on the Board of Advisors at Rise Institute, works as HR Business Partner at BRK Cart Pvt Ltd, and coaches young innovators as a Mentor of Change under NITI Aayog's Atal Innovation Mission.

The title on her questionnaire was Spokesperson. Her answers read like a working manual for one. All eight are printed from page eleven. One sentence from them is on our cover. She calls it her motto.

DEMO

Dr. Rabiaah Bhatia, speaker, mentor and HR leader. Professor of Practice at Amity University and a Global SDG Ambassador.

Listen first. Then speak.

Twenty-five years across offices, classrooms, studios and stages. Dr. Rabiaah Bhatia on the slow work of being believed.

For eighteen years she moved between industry domains and roles, learning people, teams and organizations from the inside. The milestones came. So did a question she could not put down, about purpose, and about what the work was for.

She stopped. Two years. When she came back, in 2015, it was to the education sector, with a plain mission: nurture young people and help develop future leaders.

In 2017 she started a business of her own. eD WebStudio Channel began as a venture promoting eco-friendliness and sustainability. It now carries her executive interviews, leadership podcasts and webinars for international audiences, and she runs it as founder, director and host.

Along the way she has been an author, a public speaker, a mentor, and an advocate for youth development and for women's empowerment. Each role taught her the same thing, and she says it without ornament. Communication is not simply speaking. It is connecting people with a purpose, building trust, and moving them to act.

That is the spokesperson's whole job, as she sees it. The rest of this issue is what it looks like in practice.

> Communication is not simply about speaking; it is about connecting people with a purpose.

In her own words.

01 The professional journey

My professional journey has been shaped by perseverance, learning and a desire to create meaningful impact. Over 18 years, I worked across different industry domains and roles, gaining experience with people, teams and organizations. Although I achieved professional milestones, I eventually felt the need for greater purpose and inner satisfaction. After taking a two-year break, I joined the education sector in 2015 with a mission to nurture young people and help develop future leaders. I began my entrepreneurial journey in 2017 and built eD WebStudio Channel, a venture that promotes eco-friendliness and sustainability. Along the way, I have worked as an entrepreneur, Founder-Director, author, public speaker, mentor and advocate for youth development and women's empowerment. These experiences taught me that communication is not simply about speaking; it is about connecting people with a purpose, building trust and inspiring action. They continue to shape the way I approach the role of a spokesperson.

> Listening first, understanding their perspective and then communicating with clarity, empathy and confidence.

02 Communication and influence

To me, effective communication means making a message clear, meaningful and relevant to the person receiving it. Different audiences have different needs, so I believe in listening first, understanding their perspective and then communicating with clarity, empathy and confidence. My experience across sectors, education, entrepreneurship, writing and public speaking has taught me to adapt my language and approach without compromising the core message. I also believe that our actions must support our words. Authenticity, consistency and respect are essential if communication is to create genuine influence.

DEMO

03 Representing an organization

Representing an organization is a responsibility that requires both loyalty and integrity. A spokesperson should communicate the organization's position accurately while remaining mindful of the public's right to clear and responsible information. I believe credibility is built by being truthful, avoiding exaggerated claims, acknowledging concerns and not making statements beyond verified facts or one's authority. Transparency does not mean sharing information that is confidential; it means being honest about what can be shared and what requires further confirmation. For me, trust is earned through consistency between what we say, what we do and the values we demonstrate.

> Trust is earned through consistency between what we say, what we do and the values we demonstrate.

DEMO

04 Handling challenges

My journey has included difficult personal and professional phases, changes in direction and moments that required me to pause, reflect and rebuild. Working across different industry domains for 18 years taught me adaptability, while my decision to take a break and move into education helped me reconnect with my purpose. Building an entrepreneurial venture also required persistence and a willingness to learn from setbacks. I approach challenges by staying calm, understanding the facts, listening to different perspectives and focusing on constructive next steps. I do not believe every challenge needs an immediate answer; sometimes the responsible response is to verify information, seek advice and communicate once the facts are clear. Every difficulty can become a learning opportunity when we meet it with courage and humility.

05 Media relations

Productive media relationships are built on mutual respect, responsiveness and accuracy. I believe in understanding a journalist's question, providing clear and relevant information, respecting deadlines and being transparent when something needs verification. It is important to distinguish confirmed facts from personal views or information that is still being checked. I would rather take the time to confirm a detail than risk sharing something inaccurate. Long-term credibility comes from being accessible, consistent and professional—not just when the news is positive, but also when questions are difficult.

> “In a crisis, the objective is not merely to protect an image; it is to protect trust.

06 Crisis communication

In sensitive or unexpected situations, my guiding principles are calmness, empathy, accuracy and accountability. First, understand what is known and what remains uncertain; then verify the facts, coordinate with the appropriate people and communicate promptly without speculation. People need to feel that their concerns are being heard, even when every answer is not immediately available. I would avoid blame, assumptions and promises that cannot be guaranteed. If new facts emerge, I believe it is important to update the message clearly. In a crisis, the objective is not merely to protect an image; it is to protect trust by communicating responsibly and putting people and facts first.

DEMO

07 When a message travels in minutes

Social media and digital platforms have made communication faster, more direct and more accessible. They allow a spokesperson to reach diverse audiences quickly, but they also increase the responsibility to check facts before sharing them. A message can travel widely within minutes, so clarity, context and consistency matter more than ever. My work as an entrepreneur, public speaker, writer and digital-platform founder has helped me understand the value of adapting to changing formats and audience expectations. I believe in using digital platforms to educate, connect and empower—not simply to attract attention. The most effective approach combines timely communication with thoughtful listening, responsible content and a human touch.

> Never sacrifice accuracy for attention.

DEMO

08 Advice for those who come next

My advice to aspiring spokespersons and communication professionals is to build character before building a public profile. Learn to listen, research thoroughly, speak clearly and admit when you do not know something. Protect your credibility by never sacrificing accuracy for attention. Develop empathy, emotional resilience and the ability to communicate with people from different backgrounds. Keep learning, welcome feedback and treat every experience—success or failure—as an opportunity to grow. Above all, be guided by a purpose larger than personal recognition. My motto is, “Be the change to bring the change.” I believe that when we work with focus, gratitude and perseverance, we can use our voices to empower others and create positive change.

Be the change to bring the change.
