She came as a tourist.

Three years, four songs, a tower that lights up at night, and a family back home that needed convincing. A note on the woman on our cover.

Erica Lanka Borba first came to Sri Lanka three years ago, as a tourist, and a doubtful one. She says so herself. What she knew of the island had come from outside it: the reports, the warnings, the general fog of reputation that settles over a country nobody you know has visited.

The fog turned out to be wrong. The heat felt like Brazil. So did the green. The people were something else again, and she still talks about them before she gets anywhere near the beaches.

Then she did the small thing that turned out to be the large thing. She opened a social media account so her friends and family back home could see what she was seeing, because they did not believe her either. The media now call her a viral phenomenon. She finds the phrase hard to say with a straight face.

There are four songs. One of them is about a tower. None of what she posts about Sri Lanka comes from a paid agreement, she tells us, and she intends to keep it that way.

Her eight answers begin on page thirteen and run as she wrote them, exclamation marks included. She uses a lot of them. We left every one in place. They are how she talks, and the way she talks is most of the story.

The country she was warned about.

Three years ago Erica Lanka Borba came to Sri Lanka for the first time, as a tourist, and a sceptical one. Her picture of the place had been drawn by people who had not been there: international reports, travel advisories, the version of the island that travels abroad without it. She admits she believed some of it.

The surprise came early. The climate was tropical and familiar, and the scenery reminded her of Brazil. She felt comfortable from the first days, which is not what she had packed for.

What kept her was the people. Ask her about the island and she will get to the beaches eventually, but she starts with a kindness that, in her words, comes from within, from people who help without expecting something back. She has been to a great many holiday destinations. She says this is the difference.

The account came next, and it was not a strategy. Back home, friends and family were still doubtful, even after hearing about her trip. So she opened a social media account to show them what Sri Lanka was really like. That was the whole plan. The audience that arrived afterwards was nobody's plan, least of all hers. When the media began calling her “Erica Lanka, the viral phenomenon”, she found it, her word, unbelievable. She still does.

She has a rule about money. The content she makes about Sri Lanka is not paid for. It comes, she says, from her own passion and conviction, and she means to keep it that way, because nobody paying her gets to decide what she says, what she shows or how she feels. It is an unusual line for a creator to draw. She draws it without fuss.

> “I never want someone telling me what I should say, what I should show, or how I should feel just because they're paying me.

A song for a tower.

The music started the way the account did. She had feelings too big to keep to herself and needed somewhere to put them. She is firm that she is not a music star and has no wish to become one. There are four songs so far: “Hari Hari Sri Lanka”, “Lotus Tower – Feeling the Power”, “From Rio to Colombo” and “Patricia Lanka”.

The Lotus Tower song is the one people ask about. She fell for the building the way she fell for the country, without meaning to. Plenty of listeners abroad have never heard of it, and they ask her what it is. She likes that. Every question is one more person who might come and see it lit up at night, which is when she likes it best.

There is a harder conversation too. A media article once asked how far Erica Lanka could actually go. Her answer is about context. On a Sri Lankan beach she wears a bikini, partly to show that tourists can; some people abroad still think they have to cover up. At a Buddhist or Hindu temple she reads up on the customs and dresses for them. At a gala dinner she dresses for a gala dinner.

Ask about the future and she has no plan to offer. None of this was planned, she points out. She wants quality tourism for the island, not mass tourism, and she worries out loud about what happens to the warmth of its people if the numbers ever swamp them. Her ambition is smaller and harder: that a few people see the videos, hear the songs, and come to find out for themselves.

Your journey to Sri Lanka

WHITE KNIT, WHITE SKIRT

Three years ago, I came to Sri Lanka for the very first time, simply as a tourist. And I have to admit something: I was a little skeptical myself! Like so many people around the world, my perception of Sri Lanka had been shaped by what the outside world tells us about this country. But the moment I arrived, I was surprised! I discovered a completely different Sri Lanka from the one I had imagined.

From the very beginning, I felt comfortable here. The tropical climate and breathtaking landscapes reminded me so much of my home country, Brazil. And somewhere along the way, I felt the desire to share this beautiful Sri Lanka with people who had only ever heard stories about it.

Building a global digital community

The truth is, I don't really know the answer myself! These days, I sometimes see the media describing me as “Erica Lanka, the viral phenomenon,” and I still find that a little unbelievable! Maybe the secret is that I never actually set out to reach a huge audience in the first place.

When I opened my very first social media account, all I wanted was to share my experiences in Sri Lanka with my friends and family. I simply wanted to show them what Sri Lanka was really like! Because even after I had experienced this beautiful country for myself, many of my friends and family members were still skeptical about Sri Lanka. And that was really how everything began.

Discovering Sri Lanka beyond tourism

COBALT, SPLIT HEM

Without a doubt, the people of Sri Lanka! They are the ones who truly captured my heart! There is something so incredibly special about their warmth, their kindness, and that beautiful, genuine innocence I continue to experience here. People are always willing to help. And what touches me most is that you can actually feel where that kindness comes from.

It comes from within. From the heart. From love. Not because they expect something in return.

I've been fortunate enough to visit many beautiful places around the world. And of course, Sri Lanka is a breathtaking country, with its spectacular landscapes, tropical nature, and gorgeous beaches. But do you know what makes the real difference for me? The people! They are what makes Sri Lanka so wonderfully unique!

"It comes from within. From the heart. From love."

DEMO

The story behind “Lotus Tower – Feeling the Power”

Love! It was simply love! Everything I create here in Sri Lanka comes from love. The content I share to promote this beautiful country comes from my own passion and personal conviction, not from paid advertising agreements. And that's exactly how I want to keep it! Because being authentic means everything to me. I never want someone telling me what I should say, what I should show, or how I should feel just because they're paying me. I want to remain free to express what genuinely comes from my heart.

I fell in love with Sri Lanka, especially its wonderful people. And then, something very similar happened with the Lotus Tower! You know, love is something you simply cannot control! It arrives when it arrives, and sometimes it leaves when it leaves. You cannot force it, schedule it, or tell it what to do. And it was exactly that feeling of love that inspired me to dedicate a song to this magnificent landmark of Sri Lanka.

I wanted to share my fascination with people all around the world, because so many have never even heard of this incredible building! Sometimes people actually ask me, “What is that? What exactly is the Lotus Tower?” And I think that's wonderful! Because discovering the Lotus Tower is yet another beautiful reason to come and experience Sri Lanka. Especially at night, when it lights up in all those magnificent colors! Oh my goodness, it's absolutely breathtaking! And just talking about it makes my heart beat a little faster all over again!

The power of music and cultural connection

COBALT, GOLD CLASPS

I started writing music because I wanted to give my feelings and my love another way to express themselves. I'm not some big music star, and I certainly don't dream of becoming one! Every song I've created, whether it's “Hari Hari Sri Lanka,” “Lotus Tower – Feeling the Power,” “From Rio to Colombo,” or “Patricia Lanka,” was born from genuine emotions and a whole lot of love.

I don't create music because I want to become famous or collect millions of views. I create it because sometimes the feelings inside my heart are simply too big to keep to myself. Music gives those feelings a voice. It's my way of sharing my personal experiences, my emotions, and the things that touch my soul.

And do you know what I find so beautiful about music? It has this incredible power to connect people from completely different countries and cultures, even when they don't speak the same language. Because sometimes, the heart understands what words cannot express. And that is what I love most about music!

“Music gives those feelings a voice.”

Authentic storytelling and local connections

Always with the deepest respect! There was once a media article asking, “How far can Erica Lanka actually go?” And I think there's something very important we need to understand. Respecting another culture doesn't mean you have to give up your own identity.

When I wear a bikini on a beach in Sri Lanka, I'm not trying to provoke anyone. Quite the opposite! I want to show people around the world that Sri Lanka is a beautiful, welcoming holiday destination where tourists can enjoy the beach just as they would in other popular tropical destinations. Because believe it or not, there are still people out there who think you have to cover yourself up even when you're on the beach in Sri Lanka! And that's exactly the kind of misconception I want to help change.

But respect goes both ways! Whenever I visit a Buddhist or Hindu temple, I fully respect its religious traditions. I take the time to learn about the customs, and I make sure I'm dressed appropriately. If I'm invited to a gala dinner, I dress elegantly and respectfully for the occasion. And if I feel like being a little sexy? Well, then I choose the right place for that too!

For me, it's really quite simple. Every place, every culture, and every occasion deserve its own kind of respect. And that's another thing I love so much about Sri Lanka. People here cherish their own traditions while also welcoming visitors from different cultures with warmth and openness. You can stay true to who you are while showing genuine, heartfelt respect for someone else's culture.

07 Turning digital success into new opportunities

You know what? I don't actually have any big plans for the future! None of this digital success was planned! It just happened! And now I'm doing my best to grow into this unexpected new world as the creative, passionate woman I've always been.

I don't have decades of experience doing what I'm doing today. So much of it is still new to me. Sometimes it's unbelievable, sometimes a little overwhelming, and sometimes I just stop and think, “Oh my goodness, is this really happening to me?” But it's beautiful, and I'm truly grateful for everything that has happened.

I'm simply trying to embrace this journey and live up to the opportunities it brings, without ever losing sight of who I really am. I'm not here to sell Sri Lanka. I'm here to show people the Sri Lanka that I, Erica Lanka, see, feel, and love.

And you know something? If my music and videos inspire even just a few people to visit this beautiful country and discover it for themselves, then my dream has already come true!

As for what the future holds? I genuinely have no idea! I'm right here, in the middle of this incredible journey, simply continuing to do what I've done from the very beginning. I'm following my heart.

08 Your vision for Sri Lanka's global story

I've traveled a great deal throughout my life, and I've been fortunate enough to experience many beautiful holiday destinations around the world. And do you know what I truly believe? Sri Lanka has extraordinary potential! I genuinely believe this country deserves to step out of the shadow of the negative perceptions, travel advisories, and international reports that have influenced how so many people around the world see it.

Not because Sri Lanka needs to change! Quite the opposite! Sri Lanka doesn't need to change who it is. What needs to change is the way the outside world sees Sri Lanka!

And when I talk about tourism, I'm certainly not talking about mass tourism that could one day overwhelm or damage this beautiful island. I'm talking about quality tourism. Thoughtful, respectful tourism that appreciates and protects what makes this country so special.

Sri Lanka has everything! Breathtaking tropical beaches, a wonderful climate, magnificent mountains, fascinating cultures, and different religions living peacefully alongside one another. But do you know what this island's greatest treasure really is? Its people! Their honesty, their warmth, their open hearts, and that wonderful ability to welcome others with genuine love, without constantly expecting something in return. That, to me, is what sets Sri Lanka apart from so many other destinations around the world. The people are Sri Lanka's greatest superpower!

But this is also where my biggest concern lies. What happens if tourism grows dramatically one day, and the very people who make Sri Lanka so special begin to change because of it? What happens if that natural warmth and kindness slowly give way to purely commercial thinking? Then the very thing that makes Sri Lanka so extraordinary could collapse like a beautiful house of cards. And that would be heartbreaking!

Perhaps that is why, at this moment in my life, I feel as though I've discovered something very special here. A purpose. With my honesty, my openness, my creativity, and most importantly, my love, I want to help the world discover Sri Lanka as it truly is. Because I often say that far too many people around the world have such an unfair, negative image of this beautiful country without ever having experienced it for themselves.

And you know what? Maybe my story is actually a little fairy tale! Maybe I'm the princess who discovers a beautiful island that has been misunderstood by the world for far too long. And perhaps, with one little kiss, the spell is finally broken. Suddenly, what the world once misunderstood transforms into a handsome prince! A prince named Sri Lanka!

And if my music, my creativity, and my love can help the world discover that prince and see him through the same loving eyes that I do … Then that would be the most beautiful happily-ever-after I could ever wish for.
