Before the First Bell, There Is a Story

A child misses school. An assignment goes unfinished. A parent's chair sits empty at a meeting. Each tells a school that something has been missed. Verna Felder wants to know what happened before anyone walked through the door.

After more than twenty years in education, she has learned how much of a student's school day begins at home, with circumstances that never appear on a report card. Understanding those circumstances has become central to her work and the way she measures her leadership.

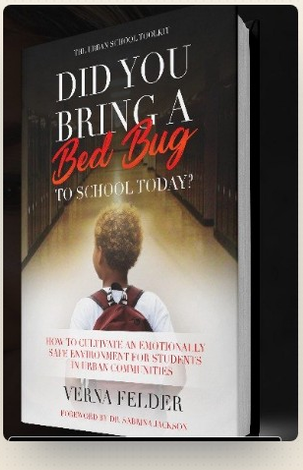

Her standard comes down to three questions: Did I listen carefully? Did I follow through? Did anything improve because I became involved?

For Felder, those questions are personal. Raising three children as a single mother, she once faced a choice between putting gas in the car and paying fifteen dollars for her daughter's field trip. She remembers wanting to meet both needs and having to choose. Today, an unpaid fee is a reason to begin a conversation.

Those experiences helped shape her book, Did You Bring a Bed Bug to School Today? How to Cultivate an Emotionally Safe Environment for Students in Urban Communities. They also inspired her company, The Urban School Transformation LLC, and Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™, which she created with Charlene Cutler. With four decks of cards on the table, educators must navigate difficult decisions using the resources available to them. The experience asks them to reconsider what they assume about the families they serve.

Beginning on page nine, Felder answers eight questions about her journey, her work, and the responsibilities of leadership. Her responses appear in full, in the order asked, giving readers room to follow the experiences and convictions behind her answers.

PRIMECREST EDITORIAL DESK

Verna Felder with Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™. On the box: a sensitivity experience for educators.

A Clearer View of What Children Need

Felder remembers what fifteen dollars could mean to her family. That experience still shapes the questions she asks, but her work also reaches toward what comes after the answer: finding help.

Sometimes, that help begins with something as practical as a pair of glasses. A child struggling to follow a lesson may be unable to see the board. A student who seems distracted may be sitting through class with a toothache. Understanding the circumstances opens the conversation. Connecting a family with care can change what happens next.

Free eyeglasses. Dental services. Resources that put essential care within reach. Through partnerships with community organizations and service providers, Felder works to connect struggling families with support that can make a school day feel different.

These are the practical possibilities behind the term “wraparound services.” For a parent, the immediate concern may be simpler: Where can I get help for my child, and can we afford it?

Schools can be a trusted place to begin finding answers. But a referral is only useful if a family knows what to do next. Clear information, an accessible contact, and someone willing to follow through can turn an offer of help into care a child actually receives.

Felder's approach brings that responsibility into focus. Building partnerships means knowing whom to call, understanding what help is available, and connecting people with care and respect. It also means recognizing that families may be managing several urgent needs at once.

Her experience has taught her to look beyond the first explanation for a student's struggle. What appears to be disengagement may warrant a conversation. What emerges from that conversation may call for a community partner.

The purpose is concrete: help a child see clearly, access dental care, or arrive at school better able to participate. For Felder, supporting learning includes paying attention to what makes learning possible.

LIFE EVENT CARD

“Sometimes, helping a child succeed in the classroom begins with connecting their family to care beyond it.”

The Signs We Cannot Afford to Miss

For Verna Felder, connecting families with support begins with recognizing when they need it. That responsibility took on greater urgency when she learned that a school aged child had died while the family was sleeping in a car in a casino parking lot.

The news stayed with her. It strengthened her determination to prepare school staff to recognize distress before a family's circumstances become a tragedy.

Every adult has a role. A bus driver may notice persistent exhaustion. A cafeteria worker may recognize recurring hunger. An office employee may be the first person a parent tells about losing housing. These moments can open a conversation, but staff need to know what to ask and how to respond.

Felder's trainings focus on seeing the whole child. Changes in attendance, withdrawal, and difficulty concentrating deserve attention and thoughtful questions. Staff also need clear steps for sharing concerns, connecting families with assistance, and seeking urgent help.

Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™, created with Charlene Cutler, brings that responsibility into the room. Participants navigate competing needs and limited resources, then examine how those pressures might appear in the students and families they serve. The experience challenges them to carry greater awareness, and a readiness to act, back to school.

At the table, a difficult round ends. For a child returning to a car to sleep, the hardship continues after dismissal. Felder wants every staff member prepared to recognize that possibility and respond while there is still time to help.

"Any player may read this card aloud."

Every choice costs something. When resources run short and life takes an unexpected turn, what can you afford to lose? Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™ puts that question in players' hands.

For the creators, the purpose is to challenge the assumptions behind "Why don't they just...?" No game can replicate poverty, but it can reveal how quickly options disappear and how easily struggle is misunderstood.

For educators and organizations seeking greater empathy, stronger teams, and more responsive service, the experience ends with a question that reaches beyond the table: Now that you see things differently, how will you respond?

PROFESSIONAL JOURNEY

How has your 20+ years in education shaped your leadership?

More than twenty years in education have taught me to pay attention to what happens after a decision leaves the meeting room. A policy can look good on paper, but what does it mean for the teacher expected to carry it out, the parent trying to understand it, or the child affected by it? Those are the questions I bring to leadership.

I have worked as a teacher, a media specialist, and a liaison supporting students and families experiencing homelessness. Each role has given me a different view of what schools need to succeed. Being a single mother of three taught me something equally valuable: wanting the best for your children and having the resources to provide it are two different things.

Those experiences have made me compassionate, but they have also made me more direct. I believe in high expectations. I also believe that when we identify a barrier, we have a responsibility to decide what we can do about it. Sometimes that means finding a community partner. Sometimes it means questioning a process we have followed for years.

That is part of why Charlene Cutler and I created Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™. I wanted to bring what I had learned working with families into rooms where people make decisions about them, and give those conversations somewhere useful to go.

Today, I am more willing to ask a difficult question, bring people together, and take the first step. Education has taught me that leadership earns its value through what people can count on you to do.

QUESTION 01 · PROFESSIONAL JOURNEY

EDUCATIONAL LEADERSHIP

What are the biggest challenges facing education today?

One of the biggest challenges facing education today is that the expectations remain high while the capacity to meet them is often stretched thin. Schools are expected to meet state academic standards while addressing gaps in learning, student mental health needs, barriers to attendance, and a shortage of qualified teachers. Each of those demands requires time, expertise, and resources.

The lack of qualified teachers is especially concerning because strong instruction is the foundation of student achievement. When positions remain unfilled or educators are assigned outside their areas of expertise, students can lose continuity and experienced teachers carry additional responsibilities. Yet the expectation to bring every student to proficiency remains. We have to take recruiting, developing, and retaining qualified educators as seriously as we take the results we expect them to produce.

In my work with families, I also see what academic expectations look like in a child's daily life. A student may be expected to concentrate on a reading assessment after spending the night worrying about where their family will live. A parent may want to attend a school meeting but cannot afford to miss work. Those circumstances deserve a practical response. High expectations become meaningful when students have a realistic opportunity to meet them.

That means investing in strong instruction, timely academic intervention, mental health support, and relationships that allow schools and families to work together. It also means giving teachers the preparation, support, and time to do their jobs well.

I believe in accountability, including meeting state standards. But accountability has to reach everyone responsible for creating the conditions for success. Before we ask why a classroom has fallen short, we should also ask whether it had a qualified teacher, appropriate resources, and consistent support.

The challenge is making our commitment to education visible in what we provide every day. Our expectations for children should be matched by the seriousness of our investment in their success.

QUESTION 02 · EDUCATIONAL LEADERSHIP

03

INNOVATION & IMPACT

What inspired you to create Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™?

The inspiration came from working with families whose daily lives required decisions that many people never have to consider. When money, transportation, and support are limited, meeting one need can mean leaving another unmet. In education, we often see the outcome, a child's absence, an unfinished assignment, a missed meeting, without seeing the circumstances behind it.

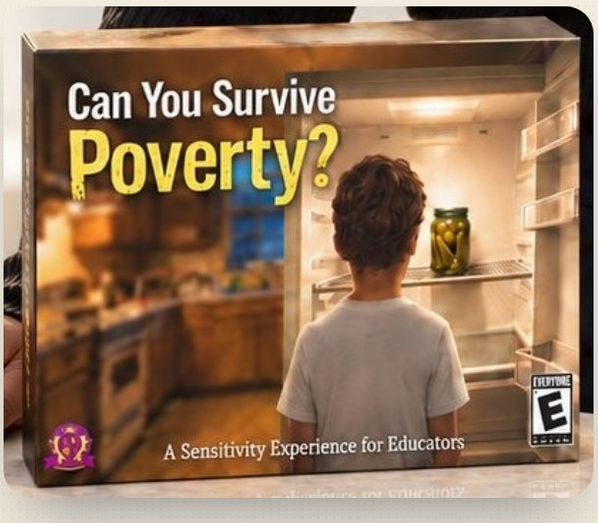

I wanted to help people understand what happens before a family ever walks through our doors. Explaining those realities matters, but I wanted to create an experience that would make people pause before saying, "Why don't they just...?"

I co-created Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™ with Charlene Cutler to bring those difficult choices into the room. Participants navigate systemic barriers, unexpected life events, and limited resources while trying to maintain stability. They have to make decisions with what they actually have available, then face what happens next.

We knew a game could never capture the full experience of living in poverty. What it could do was give people a reason to examine their assumptions and recognize how quickly circumstances can narrow someone's options.

For me, the purpose reaches beyond empathy. I want participants to reconsider the policies they enforce, the questions they ask, and the support they offer. An educator might rethink an attendance response. A leader might recognize that a process intended to help is difficult for families to access.

Charlene and I created this game because understanding should change how we act. The most important part is what participants do differently when they return to the people and communities they serve.

COMMUNITY VISION

How do you hope to improve educational opportunities in the Detroit community?

I want our children's opportunities to reach farther than the blocks they grow up on. Detroit has extraordinary talent sitting in its classrooms, including children who have yet to encounter the experience that will help them discover their own.

For some students, the careers they know are the ones they see in their neighborhood or immediate community. I want us to widen that view deliberately. Put a golf club in a child's hands. Take them to the opera. Let them walk through an engineering firm and ask questions of the people designing what comes next. We cannot expect children to choose from possibilities they have never encountered.

And when they meet successful professionals who look like them, I want more than a photograph and an inspirational speech. Tell them about the first application, the rejection, the mentor, the financial obstacles, and the decisions that changed everything. Show them how the journey unfolds so they can begin to map their own.

That exposure should lead somewhere. A visit can become a mentorship. An interest can become a class, an apprenticeship, or a business idea. Schools, employers, colleges, and community organizations can work together to make those next steps accessible.

I also want students ready for a future that is changing while we prepare them for it. They need strong academic skills, opportunities to create, and the judgment to use artificial intelligence responsibly while thinking for themselves.

Through The Urban School Transformation LLC, I want to help build those connections. The game Charlene Cutler and I created asks adults to reconsider the circumstances shaping a child's life. My larger vision asks what we will make possible once we understand them.

A child may need help getting through tonight. That same child deserves a reason to be excited about tomorrow. I want our work to make room for both.

FUTURE GOALS

What are your key goals for the future of education and community development?

I want us to stop asking children to fit a school model we are unwilling to change. Expecting students to sit quietly for most of the day while we teach everyone the same way is an outdated approach. Our classrooms need more movement, creativity, hands-on learning, and flexibility.

Students bring different learning, physical, and mental health needs into school. Our response should be thoughtful design: sensory spaces for autistic students who benefit from them, opportunities for exercise, and staff trained in trauma and social and emotional learning. We need adults who can recognize distress and respond with both compassion and clear expectations.

I also want discipline that teaches. Restorative practices ask students to take responsibility, understand the harm they caused, and help repair it. Consequences should contribute to better decisions when students return to the classroom.

Parents are essential partners. We need to reinforce education as a daily priority through attendance, routines, and communication, while giving families practical support to meet those expectations.

My vision for community development extends that partnership beyond dismissal. Imagine school buildings offering evening job training, financial education, wellness programs, and activities that bring generations together. Businesses, colleges, health providers, and neighborhood organizations can help make schools places where parents build their futures alongside their children.

That is the future I want to help create: schools designed around how children learn, connected to communities where entire families have opportunities to grow.

DEMO

QUESTION 05 · FUTURE GOALS

SYSTEMIC BARRIER

06

EQUITY & INCLUSION

How can schools create more equitable and inclusive learning environments for all students?

A school can say every child belongs. I want to know what happens when that child walks through the door. Can they participate fully? Is their name pronounced correctly? Does their family feel comfortable asking questions? Those everyday experiences tell us more about inclusion than a statement on a wall.

Inclusivity encompasses students with disabilities, race, culture, language, socioeconomic circumstances, and other differences that shape how children experience school. It requires us to examine who has access to advanced classes, activities, support, and leadership opportunities, and who keeps getting left out.

That begins with an honest look at the individual school. Where are relationships breaking down? Which students are disciplined most often? Whose parents rarely attend, and have we asked why? We need to hear from the people experiencing the culture, including those who may be uncomfortable telling us the truth.

Professional development should respond directly to what we learn. A standard sensitivity presentation delivered once a year is not enough. Training needs to address that school's weaknesses, give staff practical ways to improve, and include follow through to determine whether anything has changed. Our poverty game can help open that conversation around economic hardship, but the work must continue in daily practice.

Administrators are responsible for maintaining that culture. They set expectations, model respectful behavior, address concerns, and hold themselves and their staff accountable. When exclusion is ignored, it becomes part of what a school permits.

For ethnic groups new to a school or community, belonging takes deliberate effort. Learn families' names, provide accessible communication, invite their perspectives, and help them understand unfamiliar school processes. Give them opportunities to contribute throughout the year.

I want families to feel that their presence helps shape the school. That is when inclusion becomes something they can experience and trust.

DEMO

QUESTION 06 · EQUITY & INCLUSION

07

LEADERSHIP LEGACY

What lasting impact do you hope to make through your work in education and community engagement?

I hope my legacy lives in what people are able to do because our paths crossed. A parent who feels confident speaking up for their child. A student who sees possibilities they had not considered. An educator who approaches a family with greater understanding. A woman who decides that the experience she has spent years accumulating deserves to become something of her own.

Working in education and community engagement has taught me that people remember how you handled a moment when they needed help. Did you protect their dignity? Did you take their concern seriously? Did you do what you said you would do? I want the people I have served to be able to say yes to those questions.

I also want what I have learned to remain useful beyond my daily involvement. That is why writing books, building Urban School Transformation, and co-creating Can You Survive Poverty? The Game™ with Charlene Cutler matter to me. They give the lessons gained through years of service somewhere to live and give others a starting point for their own work. I hope people use them, improve on them, and take them into places I may never reach.

There is a personal part of this legacy, too. As a Black woman who raised three children as a single mother, I want my children to see that I continued becoming. I cared for my family, served my community, and kept making room for ideas and ambitions of my own. I hope another woman sees that journey and decides to take the next step she has been postponing.

Ultimately, I want to leave people with greater opportunity and a stronger sense of what they can contribute. Years from now, someone may not remember my title or the name of a program. But if they remember that I listened, followed through, and helped them move forward, and they do the same for someone else, that would be a legacy I would be proud of.

REFLECTION DISCUSSION CARD

"I want my children to see that I continued becoming."

QUESTION 07 · LEADERSHIP LEGACY

PERSONAL MESSAGE

What advice would you offer aspiring educators and future leaders?

Ask yourself, “What would I do if I weren’t afraid?” Then give yourself permission to act on the answer. Do what scares you. Speak up in the meeting. Apply for the position. Bring your idea into the room before you have every detail figured out. Some of your greatest growth will happen when you take responsibility for something you once doubted you could do.

Leave your ego at the door. A title does not make you the wisest person in the room, and being corrected does not diminish your worth. Be willing to learn from a parent, a student, or the colleague whose perspective challenges yours. If protecting your pride becomes more important than hearing the truth, your leadership has stopped growing.

I also encourage people to approach their work with this mindset: there are no problems, only opportunities. That does not mean hardship is easy or that every circumstance has a simple solution. It means asking, “What is this showing me? What needs to change? What can I help make possible?” You may not control what arrives at your door, but you can choose how thoughtfully and courageously you respond.

And do what you love. Find someone to pay you for it. Take the work that gives you purpose seriously enough to develop your skills, understand its value, and build something sustainable. A calling deserves preparation as much as passion.

Above all, remember that your decisions will touch lives you may never fully understand. Stay curious. Keep your word. Be brave enough to begin and humble enough to change direction. Years from now, your greatest testimony of growth may be the work you almost let fear talk you out of doing.
